Hello and welcome to this week's Where to dine? In our series on Mediterranean restaurants in and around London, we felt it was time for a taste of traditional, Italian cuisine. So, last week we paid a visit to Angelo's, one of those little restaurants right in the centre of the city. The restaurant has changed a lot since it first opened six years ago, and it looks more stylish now. One thing you notice when you come in is that there's lots of space. Unlike some other restaurants we could name, tables here are placed wide apart so you can sit and talk comfortably. The walls are covered with Italian paintings and photographs, and the background music and soft lighting give it a friendly, relaxing atmosphere. Now to the food. At Angelo's, you can taste traditional Italian dishes, simple but always tasty. It's the kind of place where cooking comes first and presentation second. Not a bad thing, we believe. The menu has something for everyone, from pasta to seafood with rice or potatoes, each very well prepared. There is a large selection of starters and I found it almost impossible to make a choice. You can choose from traditional thick soups to lighter appetisers, such as cold cuts or green beans in warm lemon sauce. Our main course was "agnello", roast lamb with garlic and fresh mushrooms. In a word, fantastic. Lorenzo, the head chef, also offers daily specials, including fresh fish and thick stews. So, it's a good idea to check the chalk board when you go in. As for the desserts, be careful. All the sweets come in such big portions and are so delicious that they'll destroy your diet. We thought the homemade tiramisu was absolutely heavenly, but you may just want to finish off your meal with a cup of espresso. So, whether for a romantic dinner for two or a pasta dish with friends, I wholeheartedly recommend Angelo's for a funny evening of eating out.
